2015

English National Identity in English Colonial and Imperial Literature and Undergraduate Publication Research

Megan A. Medeiros
megan_medeiros@my.uri.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.uri.edu/srhonorsprog

Part of the European History Commons, and the Literature in English, British Isles Commons

Recommended Citation
http://digitalcommons.uri.edu/srhonorsprog/423

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Honors Program at the University of Rhode Island at DigitalCommons@URI. It has been accepted for inclusion in Senior Honors Projects by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@URI. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@etal.uri.edu.
Part I: English National Identity in English Colonial and Imperial Literature: Eighteenth Century to Early Twentieth Century

Honors Project: History Thesis and Publication

Introduction:
What defines a nation? How does a nation define its citizens? What national characteristics pervade a culture, a people, a life? The question of a nation’s identity is a popular point of research for the historian.

My Paper:
For my project, I chose to research Englishness to inquire about national identity. Throughout my paper I worked to highlight the characteristics, norms and structures of English national identity. To make my argument, I chose to use English works of literature as a primary source of historical evidence. However, since England has such a long list of proficient and well-read authors, I narrowed down my base of evidence by using novels which featured the confrontation between English characters and characters defined as non-English, non-European, and non-white. Thus, my paper represents how Englishness has been defined and established through its confrontation with “otherness.”

Results:
From my research, I was able to argue that classic English authors established, defined, and perpetuated English norms, characteristics, and standards of English national identity and, thus, helped create and draw attention to boundaries drawn to distance Englishness from otherness.

Part II: Publishing historical papers in academic journals

Research:
Megan Medeiros

Purpose, Rationale and Aim:
Ever since I was a child, I have loved to learn about history and, as a result, I have almost always known that I wanted to study history in college. As a Senior, I have been seriously considering continuing my education and getting my Masters and PhD in history. As a result, I modeled my project as a means to “test the waters” for serious academic work in history. The first section of this project was to get a glimpse into writing and researching a substantial and original historical paper. To complement that, this second portion was designed as a means to research the publishing world which professional historians are obliged to face.

Research:
For this portion of my project, I compiled and researched a number of questions that are relevant to publishing historical papers. Questions I attempted to answer included: What is publishing like for historical papers? What are the requirements? Can I publish as an undergraduate? What are the guidelines? What can I expect?

Results:
Through my research, I found that publishing is a long process which demands a serious time commitment and a lot of work. Many journals have different paper and content requirements. Also the process of publishing is especially difficult for undergraduates, though not impossible.