Delegates Create Policy Proposals for Improved Library and Information Services

By Eric Donaldson

President George Bush, First Lady Barbara Bush and nearly 2000 others attended the 1991 White House Conference on Library and Information Services (WHCLIS) held last month in Washington, DC.

Delegates representing all 50 states, the District of Columbia and six U.S. Territories had gathered to debate policy proposals and adopt final recommendations designed to improve our nation's library and information services and their use by the public.

"Technology can make us more productive as a society, and information technology arms us with unprecedented power. Our kids will need high-tech skills to compete in the global marketplace of the 21st century," President Bush told the delegation.

The ninety-seven recommendations which resulted from the five day discussion and debate, will be incorporated into the 1991 WHCLIS Final Report that is due to be delivered to the President in November and subsequently passed along to the Congress.

The recommendations dealt with such issues as:
- Library services for diverse populations and the disabled.
- Guaranteed access to information.
- The role of library and information services in the America 2000 Education Strategy.
- Funding sources and control.
- Library collection development.
- The development of a nationwide information network.
- Privacy protection for library patrons.
- Reduced telecommunications and mailing rates for libraries.

The Conference was opened during ceremonies on Wednesday, July 10; with First Lady Barbara Bush in attendance.

"Libraries are really one of the greatest gifts that the American people have ever given themselves," Mrs. Bush stated. "They're a gift for all of us—no restrictions of age or gender or class or interest. But they're a gift that need our constant care and attention."

The Conference employed three themes: library and information services for enhancing literacy, improving productivity, and strengthening democracy. Keynote speeches were delivered on each.

Chairman and C.E.O. of United Telecommunications Inc. William T. Esrey delivered the keynote address on productivity. "Together we are building an invisible powerhouse, a kind of global mind, and libraries are the bulk of the gray matter," stated Esrey.

On the topic of Democracy, Congressman Major Owens defined our mission as, "to go forward with the vital message that libraries still make a great contribution to our democracy by providing the most education for the least amount of money."

Senior Fellow at George Washington University Mary Hatwood Futrell called on all citizens, from librarians to administrators of the corporate world, to be part of the nation-building team to make the country literate.

Also speaking to the assembled library and information professionals, supporters and guests on Wednesday, Mrs. Marilyn Quayle told the delegates of the important role they were in Washington to fulfill.

"Before you can lead you must first learn to listen," she stated. "This week is an opportunity for Washington policymakers to listen and to learn from professionals in the field."

Thursday of Conference week began with a Joint Congressional Hearing Chaired by Senator Claiborne Pell and Congressman Pat Williams. Among those giving testimony to the panel were Librarian of Congress James Billington, Timothy Healy, President of the New York Public Library, Pat Schuman, ALA President and Joan Ress Reeves, Chair of the WHC Task Force. Delegate Enrique Ramirez gave moving testimony on how an adult reading program in his local library in Northern California enable him to learn to read and changed his life.

During the Friday Great Debate, Futurist Clem Bezold of the Institute for Alternative Futures, presented three possible scenarios on the future of Library and Information Services. His theories were then debated by key members of the library and information community.

Delegates and Alternates to this year's Conference were able to tour the Government Printing Office; attend two "Information show rooms", one at the Smithsonian Museum of American History and another at Tech 2000 in the TechWorld Plaza; and enjoy an Opening night gala hosted by the Presidential cabinet spouses at the National Museum for Women in the Arts.

Secretary of Education Lamar Alexander also addressed the Conference and urged the American people to "pick up the President's charge"

"Libraries are the center of the revolution beginning in American schools. Help adopt America's education goals in your hometown," Alexander challenged.

On the Conference's closing day Senator Paul Simon was warmly received as a luncheon speaker.

"What we have to do, among other things, is focus the attention on education. Education is not a luxury, libraries are not a frill," Simon said.

Other speakers at the Conference included Congressman Newt Gingrich, Librarian of Congress James Billington, and Deborah Kaplan, Director on Technology Policy at the World Institute on Disability.
From the Desk Of: Charles E. Reid, Chairman
National Commission on Libraries and Information Science

Dear WHCLIS Friends:

Recently, I wrote a letter to President Bush to thank him for his remarks at our White House Conference on Library and Information Services. In my letter I referred to the Conference as a "magnificent success". Truly, the success of our Conference is a direct result of the participation of you, the delegates, alternates, honored guests and observers, and the contribution that each of you has made to this momentous undertaking.

The months of work all of you put in at the state level and the five days we spent in Washington were indeed important and exciting. Together we shared our visions of the Nation's library and information services, revitalized by a national renaissance of learning and education in the next decade. But, as I said at the Closing Banquet on Saturday night, this Conference has been about people; the people of this great Nation who reflect the same values and principles as those who founded our libraries and who were the inspiration for those information services that are today the envy of the world.

We learned a tremendous amount during the Conference week. We learned that Democracy can be a cumbersome process, but more importantly, we learned the concerns and needs of average Americans regarding library and information services.

Now that our recommendations for the improvement of our Nation's library and information services and their use by the public are complete, the U. S. National Commission on Libraries and Information Science is developing coordinated strategies for their implementation.

Alliances are planned with the many groups, organizations, and constituencies with an interest in the Conference themes of literacy, productivity, and democracy. The Commission plans to tap many different sources of wisdom and energy in the coming months to help assure a successful implementation process. I am sure that I can count on your help and assistance in this effort.

In thanking you for your contribution to the White House Conference, I can think of no better statement than the words of Marilyn Quayle at the Conference:

"Productivity, Literacy, Democracy: Together they point the way to an American future dynamic enough to be competitive, inclusive enough to be generous, and thoughtful enough to be truly civilized."

Best of luck to each of you as you been the process of making the WHCLIS recommendations into policy within your local communities and home states. Just as you were the White House Conference, you are the foundation of the implementation process as well!

Sincerely,
Charles E. Reid

Delegates, Supporters Continue the Work of WHCLIS

By Sondra Cohen

The Convention Center doors closed to the White House Conference on Libraries and Information Services several weeks ago, but the issues discussed remain vital. With the final 97 recommendations passed, all of the approximately 2000 participants, observers and delegates, now have a specific agenda to help develop and execute programs that will ensure the enhancement of literacy, increase productivity and strengthen democracy.

The proud Mayor of Alliance and a delegate to the Conference, Eva Knight, tells her story of being tired of the hustle and bustle of New York City. She and her husband decided to relocate their family and export business to Mrs. Knight’s native Alliance, Nebraska. Phone lines, a fax machine and computers connected them from this rural town to the rest of the world. At the local library they learned about the railway system around Alliance and based on the knowledge acquired, earned an additional $250,000 for the export company.

Knight says, “Geographic place is no longer as important. There is a real opportunity for rural communities as contact points. Hopefully the Conference will lead us in a direction so this success story is common.” Using the library and technology, this citizen was able to improve the quality of his own life and increase his productivity as well, she noted.

The responsibility of keeping the momentum generated by the White House Conference starts with the transitional leadership according to Joan Ress Reeves, a member of the WHCLIS Advisory Committee, who is now a part of the White House Conference on Library and Information Services Taskforce (WHCLIS) transition team. The team retains leadership until the 1992 WHCLIS Annual Conference where elections will be held.

Reeves said, “it [WHCLIS] is a membership organization that serves to communicate issues and facilitate activities in support of past and upcoming White House Conferences.” Now that the Conference itself is over “we clearly have a certain agenda determined by the recommendations of the White House Conference,” Reeves said.

Ann Eastman who chaired Virginia’s Governor’s Conference and served as a library and information supporter delegate at the White House Conference, will now work with the ALA to implement programs. She said, “Our big concern is how are we going to manage the forward thrusts with the group of resolutions as passed. Now we need time to consider them thoughtfully.”

In Reeves’ home state of Rhode Island, library and information services supporters have already made their voice heard. When severe cuts recently threatened the Rhode Island public libraries, “delegates to the Governor’s Conference responded and worked for advocacy for the plight the state was in,” she said. A rally was one of the activities planned to protest the budget cuts and Reeves was impressed by the response.

“Many of the people at the rally were new to the process, but they worked with the existing leadership to plan the rally and help with advocacy. Many of the cuts were restored by this action,” Reeves said.

Reeves who served as a citizen delegate on the first White House Conference and as a member of the WHC Advisory Committee that helped plan the event, has seen how the Conference does succeed in action (the WHC 1979 resulted in action on 55 out of 64 recommendations).

“Now,” she says, “a whole new cadre of leadership that was developed by the process to move in and implement work on the White House Conference will work in coalition with related agencies, associations, lay people and non-library groups.”

Mayor Knight, too, is busy working to disperse awareness about the needs and functions of rural libraries. She has developed a conference, “Economic Development and Rural Libraries: Ideas that Make Cents and Dollars Too” In the Information Age,” slated to convene in October in order to discuss how libraries can assist small businesses and economic development efforts in communities.

“We all talk about technology and the Information age,” Knight said, “but it is more an urban phenomena. Many rural libraries don’t even have phones yet and are operating under very limited circumstances.”

The Nebraska Mayor says, “I love rural America and I want everyone there to benefit from economic development which could start with these library and information services.” Library advocates have not had to tug hard on Knight’s sleeve for her support. She developed her own library at the young age of seven and has been an enthusiastic advocate ever since.

Reeves said, “It has been said over and over, but it is true, “The White House Conference is not an event, it is a process.” Knight said, “There is a general feeling that a White House Conference leads to action.”

While supporters of Library and Information Services did not need the Conference as a catalyst for advocacy activities, the shared ideas, inspiration and support from the Conference serve as another shove in the direction of understanding, awareness and action, for and by, the American public.
The following are the 97 recommendations adopted by the 1991 White House Conference on Library and Information Services in the exact text as adopted by the delegates. Thirty-one recommendations were adopted during floor voting and 60 by consent calendar. Six petitions were additionally passed by the delegation.

These recommendations, which are currently being prepared for delivery to President Bush and members of Congress, are the result of a multi-year process began during state and territory pre-conference activities in April of 1990. Citizens across America played a role in creating thousands of policy proposals which have now been melded into this final set.

Access to information was the delegation's top priority with the adoption of 23 recommendations dealing with access issues. National Information Policy was a second area of high concern with a total of 19 policy proposals.

To that end, the federal government must encourage local library communities, (including public, academic, private, school, corporate, correctional and other special libraries) to actively collaborate with all community service providers and agencies ensuring that libraries serve as full partners in community progress and planning. Government and library officials and representatives of the private sector must work together to amass sufficient funds to provide these necessary resources. The President and the Congress must recognize that it is crucial to the national interest to support education and research by expanding and fully funding statutes related to information services such as the Higher Education Act, Medical Library Assistance Act, College Library Technology Demonstration Grants, Library Service and Construction Act (LSCA), and the National Research and Education Network (NREN) and other related statutes. RECOMMENDATION NO: CRC NET12-1
TITLE: RURAL SERVICES
RECOMMENDATION(S):
1. Equal opportunity to participate in our country's economic, political, and social life depends upon equal access to information. Networks connecting rural, small, tribal and urban libraries should be developed and supported both at the Federal, State and Local levels to ensure basic library services to all end-users. A Delegate’s Crash Course

Menu: Literacy, Productivity, Democracy

By Linda G. Harris

I’ve spent a lifetime taking advantage of Libraries— and taking them for granted. Ours was a military family and part of the ritual of getting settled in a community was a visit to the library. Our library trail included story hour at a municipal library in Oklahoma, biographies borrowed from an old brick library in Illinois, and microfilm research at the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C.

In my work, I’ve used librarians as personal encyclopedias and archival tour guides. But until lately, I had hardly known a librarian by name or considered their cost of the information that helps me make a living. Earlier this year, however, I was asked to be a public representative to the New Mexico/White House Conference on Libraries and my library education began in earnest. For three days in February we met in Albuquerque, writing, debating, and passing resolutions on library issues. At the close, eight of us were elected to represent New Mexico at the White House Conference on Library and Information Services to be held in Washington, D.C. in July. As in every state, the number of delegates was based on population and included an equal number of librarians, library trustees, government officials, and people like me from the general public.

By Spring I had received the first shipment of background material and quickly figured out why I had to sign an agreement to read all pre-conference materials. The paper pile grew to include articles, brochures, booklets, background papers, The Library Book, book notes, and briefing books. Lobbying groups also sent materials (including a video production and a leather bookmark) to inform me of their special role in libraries. Two days before the Conference the UPS truck was still making deliveries to my doorstep.

From July 9 - 13, 700 well-prepared delegates participated in a process that proved exhilarating, frustrating, inspirational and in the end down right democratic. Non-voting alternates and observers added to the total attendance that reached nearly 2,000 by Conference end.

The importance of the Conference was underlined by the appearance of speakers like President Bush who talked about a “world united by information highways” and Barbara Bush who told us that libraries are “the greatest gifts Americans have given themselves.” With equal measures of reality and inspiration, keynote speakers addressed our Conference topics of literacy, productivity and democracy. Congressman Newt Gingrich’s ideological approach to the literacy problem was balanced against the convictions expressed by Senator Paul Simon.

With our thoughts provoked, we divided into 10 topic groups and who knows how many sub-groups where disjointed discussions of the three Conference themes went on into the night. I left feeling like I had been placed in an honors discussion group by mistake. Plus, the disorganized noisiness of it all frustrated me. After a heartening talk (also known as a caucus) from my state delegation, I returned to my group the next morning fairly perky and filled with resolve. Our discussion began to fall into a coherent pattern and I got the hang of it enough to jump in with an opinion or two. I had selected National Information Policy as my topic because I understood most of the issues and felt I could add my voice on matters such as copyright, intellectual freedom, and multicultural services. Although our members did not always agree—which was the true value of having non-librarian delegates—we worked as a team, and by the end of the day had hammered out our draft recommendations from all ten topic groups.

The next morning, Friday, each topic group revised the collective draft of recommendations. Except for those on National Information Policy, which had been lost. Somehow. In the computer. But by now we were to stubborn to give up. One member of our group, a state senator from Iowa, said he would recreate our revised recommendations from his notes and guaranteed to have them to us by noon. Go for it! We were even beginning to sound like a team.

We had only one day left to debate and vote on the 125 resolutions that had made it out of the topic committees. In a flurry of decision making and a little dictatorship, the 700 delegates were persuaded to select the top 15 recommendations that would receive priority in Saturday’s general session.

Saturday was great. I had gotten use to both the pace and the noise and looked forward to final voting. When the recommendation list was handed out, I was pleased to find myself in agreement with nearly all the top 15. Heading the list was children’s services, an ambitious attempt to integrate libraries into a wide range of school and social programs. Other key recommendations dealt with literacy, rural libraries, information technology, and the creation of an Under-Secretary of Education for library and information services.

Once we had plowed through the main recommendations we fell into confusion (continued on back page)
Conference Video to be Released this November

All agree that the White House Conference was an exciting and momentous event. Those who were not in Washington during Conference week can experience the numerous speakers, the recommendations process and meet delegates through the White House Conference Video; Library and Information Services for the 21st Century.

The video, which runs approximately 20 minutes in length, will be available this November through the Encyclopedia Britannica Educational Corporation.

The cost of the video will be $20.00 plus $4 per title for shipping and handling. Interested persons can call 1-800-554-9862 or write to Encyclopedia Britannica at 310 South Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Illinois 60604, attention promotions.

about how to vote on the remaining 110 resolutions and a score of petitions. The New Mexico delegation sent out for junk food and settled in for the duration. After nearly 12 hours, thanks to Robert's Rules of Order, we managed to deal with every single recommendation. Our work was both finished and just beginning.

The recommendations we hammered out over that week will go to President Bush and the U.S. Congress who will use them to help determine policy and national legislation. The first White House Conference on Libraries and Information Services, held in 1979, passed 64 recommendations 55 of which have since been implemented. Out of that Conference also came the Friends of the Libraries movement, which now has some 600,000 members.

Was the week worth the taxpayers' investment in us? I say yes. First, because people like me, and the mayor from Florida and the minister from Arkansas and the library volunteer from Kansas, should have a stake in what happens to the nation's libraries. Plus, no plan for public education reform should be considered without its national partner--the public library. Our job was and is to give voice to that partnership.

In my crash course on libraries I learned more about library services and how much those services cost. I discovered that librarians are not that quite. And I now know--by name--the national librarian of Yugoslavia and the city librarian at Roswell, New Mexico.
