Diplomatic Gifts on Henri III's Visit to Venice in 1574

EVELYN KORSCH

The visit of the new king of France, Henri III, to Venice in 1574 offered both the monarch and the republic an opportunity for gaining prestige. Henri presented himself to the public in many ceremonies as the new French ruler, whereas Venice used the visit for cultivating its traditional image as defender of the Christian faith. The exchange of gifts during the visit demonstrated the good diplomatic relations between the two states and presented a sign of the generosity that was required as a strategy of political representation. The gifts distributed by the king were traditional and depended on the rank of the recipient. Either they were associated with the ritual act of knighting or they were given as grateful recognition of rendered services. Venice, however, presented gifts of a more practical nature that were directly connected with the course of the visit itself.

The date of May 30, 1574, marked the death of Charles IX, King of France, and the proclamation of his brother Henri (1551-1589) as heir to the throne (Fig. 1). The year before, on May 11, 1573, Henri had been elected king of Poland, and he entered Krakow on February 18, 1574, where the coronation took place three days later. The Poles did not consent to his departure to take up the French throne, however, and thus Henri fled at night from Krakow on June 18. So as not to endanger his flight, he made only a limited number of arrangements, and in secret. He had entrusted jewels and other personal valuables to the French ambassador to Poland, Pomponne de Bellièvre, who had departed for Paris a short time beforehand. Simultaneously, he had sent a letter by messenger to his mother, Catherine de' Medici, asking that she provide financial aid as quickly as possible. In leaving Poland, his route led him initially to the imperial court in Vienna, where he sojourned from June 25 to June 29. With the advice of Maximilian II, the Holy Roman Emperor and King of Bohemia, Henri decided on the future course of the journey. He proceeded via northern Italy and Venice to Lyon and from there to Paris. This choice of route offered two advantages. It avoided passage through Protestant German lands, which were dangerous owing to hostilities in France with the Huguenots. On the other hand—and this is crucial—it permitted Henri's journey to Paris to be staged as an uninterrupted via triumphalis. The festive entries, which were prepared for the king in Vienna, in the Italian cities, and in Lyon, were the prelude for his triumphal entry into Paris. Every step with which Henri approached the French capital was accompanied by signs of honor and contributed to his prestige and to the visualization of his new function as king of France. The individual ceremonies and rituals were an integral component and conditio sine qua non of this rite of passage, which found its formal conclusion—in both ritual and legal respects—in his coronation as Henri III in Reims on February 13, 1575, and his entry into Paris on February 27, 1575.

On June 30, 1574, the French ambassador to Venice, Arnoul du Ferrier, presented Henri's letters to the Venetian senate. In the letters, Henri expressed the wish to travel through Venetian territories and requested that the necessary pass be issued. At that time the Venetian state comprised the Veneto, Friuli, and part of Lombardy. Simultaneously, the ambassador indicated that the king would greatly appreciate a visit to the Serenissima, as he had heard of its inimitable beauty.¹ The Signoria issued the permit and immediately began preparations without awaiting a definitive decision from the monarch. Also on June 30, 1574, four ambassadors extraordinary were elected, who would welcome Henri at the border and escort him for the duration of his stay in Venetian territories. They were Andrea Badoer, Giovanni Michiel, Giovanni Soranzo, and Giacomo Foscarini, with Badoer as appointed spokesman.² On July 1, Foscarini was elected treasurer and put in charge of settling the travel costs.³ Michiel was particularly well qualified for this position, as he had served as ambassador to the French court in the past. At the same time, two secretaries were elected, who were to assist the ambassadors extraordinary in performing their tasks. They were Alvise Bonrizzo and Andrea Suriano.⁴

Henri's route to Venice led from Pontebba, via Venzona, San Daniele, Spilimbergo, Sacile, Conegliano, Treviso, and Mestre to Venice. The visit to the Serenissima was the symbolic climax of the journey. In form and content, the entries that marked Henri's arrival in Conegliano and Treviso were only precursors. Correspondingly, after Henri left Venice for Paris, the entries at Padua and Rovigo, the final points in Venetian territories for this event, took place with a gradual decrease of expenditure and minimized iconography. After the king left Venetian territories, he continued his journey in the direction of Ferrara, in order to reach French soil via Mantua, Cremona, and Turin. For the duration of his stay in Venetian territories, Henri traveled as a guest of the Serenissima, which provided his retinue with board, lodging, and new horses at every stop. Messengers guaranteed daily communication between the ambassadors extraordinary who were attending to the king and officials in Venice, who strove to satisfy every requirement and desire of the French party. To commemorate the occasion permanently, the senate resolved on March 12, 1575, at du Ferrier's instigation, to affix a gilded marble tablet with a black inscription on the wall of the upper loggia at the end of the Scala dei Giganti in the Doge's Palace. The tablet can still be found there today (Fig. 2).⁵

Henri's State Visit to Venice

The structure of Henri's sojourn in Venice corresponded to the traditional phases of the ceremony of adventus principis created for rulers in classical antiquity: preparations, entry, presentation of the city, and the giving of gifts on departure. Alvisè Mocenigo (not the doge, but another family member with the same name) and Giacomo Contarini were in charge of the design of the festivities.⁶ The king's festive entry took place on July 18, 1574. Doge Alvisè Mocenigo (Alvisè is the Venetian form of Luigi, which sometimes appears in the documents for him) and the Signoria met Henri and his entourage in several galleys in Murano, where he had spent the first night. They then escorted him to San Nicolò on the Lido and were welcomed by the patriarch of Venice, Giovanni Trevisan, and the clergy (Figs. 3-4). A triumphal arch and a loggia had been constructed in the king's honor. Under a baldachin, Henri was led to the altar in the loggia, where a Te Deum was sung. Following prayers and the benediction, the king, the Doge, the Signoria, the papal legate, and princes and ambassadors boarded the Bucintoro (a gilded state galley used only on the most festive occasions) which awaited them on the bank. Flanked by fifteen galleys and thousands of other boats and accompanied by music, pealing bells, and gun salutes, the Bucintoro traveled toward the Piazza San Marco. There, the state barge turned into the Grand Canal and brought the king to Ca' Foscari, which along with the adjacent twin palazzo Ca' Giustinian had been prepared as quarters for Henri and his entourage. The presentation of the city took place in the course of the following days. It encompassed a traditional program of entertainment, including regattas, theater performances, and concerts, in addition to a banquet and a ball. Further events on the agenda were an audience with the Doge and participation in a session of the Maggior Consiglio, or Grand Council. A third component was sight-seeing, including St. Mark's Treasury, the halls of armor in the Doge's Palace, and the Arsenal. The guest's personal interests were also taken into consideration. Thus, Henri visited the famous art collection of Giovanni Grimani, the patriarch of Aquileia, and on the monarch's insistence, the Signoria organized a "war of fists" ("guerra dei pugni"), the popular sporting battle between the Castellani and the Nicolotti.⁷ In keeping with the conventions of state visits, the sojourn was concluded with a valediction ceremony and the presentation of gifts.⁸

Gifts on Behalf of the Signoria

A lavish reception itself was a customary gift on a prince's visit. Just such a reception was organized in Venice, for example, on July 19, 1574, for both the papal legate and the ambassador of Genoa.⁹ Indeed, the entire program of Venetian festivities for Henri must be understood as tribute to the French king. Henri and his entourage spent almost a month in Venetian territories as guests of the republic. This hospitality probably cost the Signoria approximately 100,000 ducats.¹⁰ The only surviving account, which covers the accumulated expenditures of the state visit for the period July 5-27, 1574, is one for about 21,000 ducats. This represents only a part of the expenditures, however, and at the same time, it offers interesting insight into the scale of the entourage and into the groups of people involved in the state visit.¹¹ The same account contains evidence that gifts were given to the papal legate and to the duke of Savoy. Exactly what kind of gifts is not recorded, but the value of the items is 128 and 119 ducats respectively. In comparison to the other outlays, both sums can be classed as rather small.¹²

At one of the meetings between Henri and the Signoria, the Doge presented Henri with a valuable manuscript on behalf of the republic. The manuscript contains the original statutes of the Ordre du Saint-Esprit (Order of the Holy Spirit), which was founded in 1352 by Louis I d'Anjou, King of Jerusalem, Naples, and Sicily, and which Henri would reestablish in 1578 (Fig. 5).¹³ The work comprises ten parchment leaves and is illuminated with numerous ornate miniatures.¹⁴ This gift was not only unique and valuable but also a reference to an ancestor of Henri's from the House of Anjou (his title before his accession to the French throne had been Duc d'Anjou) and to the spiritual congeniality of Henri and Louis. (Henri was well known for his deeply religious way of life, which found expression in daily spiritual exercises and inspired other such gifts. When he stopped in Monza on August 11, 1574, for example, the Archbishop of Milan, Cardinal Charles Borromeo, gave him a golden reliquary cross set with jewels in which a sliver of wood from Christ's cross was kept.¹⁵) No documents have been located, however, that explain why this manuscript was selected by the Venetians. Was the Signoria conscious of the special significance of the Whitsun festival for Henri's personal history and therefore chose the statutes of the Order of the Holy Spirit as a gift? At Whitsun 1573, Henri was elected king of Poland, and at Whitsun 1574, he was proclaimed heir to the French throne. Furthermore, the statutes represented the most diplomatic of all diplomatic gifts: the effusion of the Holy Spirit implied international understanding.

On July 23, 1574, the Collegio (the Venetian council of ministers) resolved to commission the ambassadors extraordinary to purchase a magnificently equipped carriage as a gift for the king. As it was to serve his onward journey, the horses were to be accustomed to carriage harnesses as well as handsome. In order to complete the order in the short time available, the ambassadors were permitted to appropriate such horses regardless of the owner or his social status. Subsequently the owners were to be paid.¹⁶ The carriage was sent to the mooring at the Portello, one of Padua's city gates, where Henri arrived late on the evening of July 27.¹⁷ The king refused the baldachin prepared for him and made use of the carriage for his entry into the city.¹⁸ On the following day the monarch visited the Basilica of St. Anthony and donated an ornate silver lamp worth 800 ducats to the altar of the saint. (Empress Maria, the widow of Maximilian II, donated a similar lamp to the altar in 1581 when she lodged in Padua before continuing her journey.¹⁹)

The Duke's Present

Catherine de' Medici had asked her brother-in-law, Emanuele Filiberto, Duke of Savoy, to accompany Henri on his journey and to remain at his side as a mentor. Emanuele Filiberto reached Venice on July 20, 1574, and informed the Signoria that he would forgo a festive entry, as he had come to demonstrate his reverence and did not wish to disrupt the progress of the festivities in Henri's honor. The duke was housed in Doge Alvise Mocenigo's private palazzo, which is located opposite the Ca' Foscari on the Grand Canal. The immediate vicinity to the king's quarters proved advantageous for the numerous meetings that were required to arrange Henri's onward journey. On July 27, Emanuele bid farewell to the Doge and thanked him for the hospitality demonstrated in Palazzo Mocenigo. He left a gift for the lady of the house, who is identified in the documents as the Doge's wife. This is incorrect, however, as Loredana Marcello had died in December 1572. The marriage had been childless, thus only the Doge's sister, Isabeta Da Molin, can be considered here. Since the death of her sister-in-law, she had attended to Alvise.²⁰ She was presented with a belt made of thirty golden rosettes. In the middle of each rosette was a precious stone, adorned with four pearls. The value of the belt was estimated at 1,800 ducats.²¹

Gifts on Behalf of the King

In Vienna, Henri and his entourage had been welcomed with great honor. The Empress had personally supervised all of the preparations, and on Henri's departure she gave him a sumptuously decorated portable bed as well as bed and table linens, all together worth 10,000 ducats, in order to make his onward journey as comfortable as possible.²² In accordance with etiquette, such marks of respect required an acknowledgement: thus the king distributed gold chains, goblets, and gifts of money, all together amounting to 12,000 ducats.²³ The Apostolic Nuncio at the imperial court, Giovanni Dolfin, even spoke of gifts amounting to more than 20,000 ducats.²⁴ As the king had ordered the urgent transfer of 12,000 ducats to Vienna, the smaller sum is more probable.²⁵

An anonymous eyewitness report spans the period July 8-29, 1574, and imparts many details of daily life during the royal visit.²⁶ The author had traveled to Venice on July 8 and had awaited the arrival of the king there. For this reason he only knew of the events prior to July 17 from hearsay. Among these is an anecdote about royal generosity in Treviso. The French entourage often mentioned a certain Tasca, who saw to the accommodations in each location en route and who twenty years earlier had been the valet of Giovanni Cappello, the Venetian ambassador at the court of Henri II, Henri's father (r. 1547-1559). When the king thanked Tasca for his outstanding service, Tasca replied that it should be taken for granted as he had known Henri since birth. Thereupon the monarch placed a chain with a timepiece around his neck and knighted him. Furthermore, Tasca was given 500 ducats and additional gifts. Distributing gifts was a ritual act that exemplified the virtue of generosity required of kings and princes. During his journey, Henri repeated this gesture on many occasions in order to establish his new role as a French king.

Two sources contain a register of the gifts given by the king in Venice.²⁷ One of these is the account drawn up by du Ferrier on July 31, 1574, of revenue and expenditures; the other is a record to be found at the end of the report of the festivities by Marsilio Della Croce, which was printed on December 1, 1574. It is not known where Della Croce obtained his information. Even if his information does not correspond in all its minutiae to the actual expenditures, it is detailed enough, however, to imply extremely close contact to officials in government circles. As indications of the value of individual gifts vary greatly in the numerous reports published about the festivities, du Ferrier's account can be regarded as the only reliable source forming the basis of these values.

The monarch used the morning of July 23 to make purchases at the Rialto and in the Merceria.²⁸ At the perfume merchant's shop alone he spent 1,125 ducats.²⁹ Then Henri called on the famous jeweler Antonio Della Vecchia to buy jewelry and gold chains worth approximately 12,000 ducats.³⁰ A part of this he intended to distribute at the end of his visit as gifts to people delegated to his service by the Serenissima and to other dignitaries. For the goldsmith's work on the chains, costs amounting to 586 ducats were accrued.³¹ Moreover, the king took an interest in a gold scepter set with precious stones, which was alleged to have cost 20,000 ducats.³² Because he had to pay half of the purchase price immediately, but did not have the financial means at his disposal, he left further negotiations to du Ferrier.³³ At the beginning of August, Henri reminded his ambassador to strive to settle debts with his creditors in Venice. The traders from whom the king had acquired pearls and other items were to be pacified with money and securities, so that they would not withdraw the goods.³⁴

Henri granted numerous audiences in Venice, so that every ambassador could pay his respects and congratulate the king on his succession to the throne. A meeting took place between Henri and the ambassador of the Sublime Porte in Constantinople which is not mentioned in the diplomatic records but only in du Ferrier's account. During the audience, the ambassador presented the king with a gift of several balsams (cosmetic and medicinal creams) and "terre sigillée." This so-called sealed earth was a compound containing clay, which was employed as medication—particularly to treat sepsis. The term originated from the custom of stamping on it the cipher of the Sultan's name (in Turkish, a tughra). Henri thanked the Turkish ambassador with a gold chain worth 300 ducats.³⁵

On the day of his departure, July 27, Henri summoned thirty-nine young Venetian noblemen who had been delegated to his service and thanked them.³⁶ In return, their spokesman, Matteo Zane, thanked him for the honor bestowed on them. The Signoria had elected forty men, but one of them was unwell for the duration of the state visit. Du Ferrier arranged that each man be presented with a gold chain worth 100 ducats on behalf of the king, and he asked of Henri, via a messenger, if it would not be generous to also award the invalid with a gold chain. Whether the king agreed to the suggestion cannot be established, as only the sum for the thirty-nine chains is documented.³⁷ Likewise, the young noblemen attempted to award the French nobleman who had delivered the gold chains to them with a gift and they sent a valuable silver bowl filled with confectionery. As an act of courtesy, however, the gift was not accepted.³⁸

The Doge accompanied the king in a gondola as far as Lizzafusina. There, he guided Henri to the piatta (a special Venetian type of cargo ship, used on rivers and canals, here meaning a gilded version for festive occasions) that would take him on the river Brenta to Padua. A lengthy farewell ceremony followed at which they assured each other they would maintain the friendly relationship between their two states. Then the king departed. As the Doge boarded his boat to return to Venice, he was detained by René de Villequier, the king's most intimate advisor.³⁹ De Villequier addressed him in French, so that Mocenigo had difficulty in understanding him. On behalf of the king he presented the Doge with a ring bearing a large diamond and requested that the Doge wear the ring in memory of Henri. Mocenigo made two modest attempts to decline the gift. As de Villequier insisted that it was the king's express wish, the Doge accepted the ring, kissed it and promised to fulfill the request to wear it.

Henri had acquired the diamond in Venice as a gift for the Doge and had it set in a ring. In du Ferrier's account, the purchase price is given as 1,050 ducats. Almost every commentator on the festivities estimated the diamond ring to be worth as much as 1,500 ducats⁴⁰ or they deemed it simply as having a "grandissimo valore."⁴¹ The presentation of the gift did not take place directly between the two princes but by means of an intermediary. From this, the authors of the reports on the festivities conclude that Henri had at first forgotten to present the ring, but then remembered it before the Doge departed. One chronicle even reports that the king had not noticed the omission until after his arrival in Moranzano.⁴² It is not possible to clarify whether the king in fact forgot the gift or whether he wanted to facilitate the Doge's acceptance of it by using an intermediary, as he knew of the Venetian law forbidding gifts from foreign princes. As he also chose an indirect method of presenting the gold chains to the young noblemen and to the ambassadors extraordinary and their secretaries, however, the gift-giving method was probably calculated.

At the request of the senate, the Doge presented a final report on July 29, 1574.⁴³ First he described his conversations with the king, which were predominantly characterized by an exchange of polite set phrases but which also contained the advice to strive toward domestic peace in France. Furthermore, he emphasized the thanks expressed by Henri for the numerous marks of respect, as well as Henri's enthusiasm for the spectacle on the day of his entry, which he praised as the most magnificent in the world. Then Mocenigo described the physical strain that the visit had imposed on him and that he had dutifully accepted in service to the state. Finally he came to discuss the gift. He mentioned that he had seen a ring attached to a cord around the king's neck as they boarded the gondola to Lizzafusina. As it later transpired, this was the diamond intended for the Doge. Mocenigo described the ring as particularly beautiful because of the large diamond and made a suggestion to the senate on how the gift should be dealt with. In honor of subsequent Doges and to commemorate its bestowal by Henri, the ring was to be engraved on its inside and thereafter kept either in the sanctuary at St. Mark's or in the church's shrine of the procurator cassier (the treasurer among the procurators who were charged with the administration of St. Mark's). On festive occasions the procurator would present the ring to the Doge, so that he could wear it to demonstrate the dignity and honor of his office as well as to commemorate the monarch eternally.⁴⁴ Mocenigo emphasized the political symbolism of the ring: it should stand not only as a mark of respect from the French king but should also be showcased as a visible sign of the "ottima intelligentia" between the two states—a phrase that today would mean "optimum bilateral relations."

The gift to the Doge triggered lively discussion, which du Ferrier reported in a letter to the king. One party wanted the diamond ring allocated to the treasury, while the other advocated that it stay in the possession of Alvise Mocenigo and his family. Du Ferrier was mistaken, however, when he reported that it had been decided to leave the diamond ring with the Doge as long as he lived and transfer it to the treasury only after his death.⁴⁵ This was presumably still one of the options when the ambassador wrote the letter at the end of July. On September 16, 1574, an almost unanimous resolution was passed in the senate. The procurators of St. Mark's were instructed to have a suitably large gold lily produced, in the middle of which the stone was to be mounted. A legible inscription was to be placed under the diamond to memorialize Henri's visit to Venice.⁴⁶ The text clarified that though Doge Alvise Mocenigo was the recipient of the diamond, it served to commemorate the king's goodwill toward the republic in perpetuity.⁴⁷ It was not a matter of a private present, but an official one given to the state. Accordingly, the diamond was to be kept in the treasury at St. Mark's and displayed on special occasions on the high altar along with other treasury items.⁴⁸ The gift was seen as a medium of a symbolic communication and was presented to the public as the sign of friendly relations between two states.

The procurators of St. Mark's commissioned the goldsmith Zuane Fiamengo with the execution of the lily. For this work Fiamengo was made cash payments on November 4 and 5 and December 23, 1574, totaling 136 ducats.⁴⁹ On March 24, 1575, he received a further thirteen ducats for the gilding of the silver base to which the lily with the diamond was to be affixed.⁵⁰ Moreover, the procurators commissioned the case maker Stasul Canton to produce a leather-covered wooden box lined with velvet, in which the gold lily was to be kept. Payment took place on March 31, 1575.⁵¹ On the same day Fiamengo received a final payment amounting to eighty ducats with the information that the lily was placed in the sanctuary.⁵²

On July 29, 1574, the four ambassadors extraordinary bid farewell to the French king in Rovigo, the final point in Venetian territories. After a speech of thanks, Giacomo Foscarini was knighted by Henri, as he was the only one of the four ambassadors not yet to bear this title.⁵³ On the same day Andrea Badoer wrote to the Doge in order to make his first report on the official conclusion of the ambassadors' mission.⁵⁴ He mentioned that shortly before his departure, the king sent a nobleman to their quarters to present each of the four ambassadors with a gold chain worth 500 ducats and to each of the two secretaries a gold chain worth 200 ducats. Moreover, he gave Colonel Stella, who had commanded the advance guard, 200 ducats. The delegated nobleman explained that Henri did not send more valuable gifts as he knew such gifts would have to be declined in accordance with Venetian law. Consequently, with items of a relatively low value the king intended to express his gratitude for services rendered and asked that they be accepted to commemorate him. Following a modest, formal refusal, the gifts were accepted to fulfill the monarch's wish. Shortly thereafter Henri proceeded to the landing on the river Po and was accompanied by the ambassadors who thus had the opportunity to thank him personally for the gifts.⁵⁵ Back in Venice the four ambassadors extraordinary likewise submitted a report to the senate.⁵⁶ First they described how they strove to fulfill the tasks of office as honorably as possible, with a high level of personal application and using private financial means. Their princely manner, much admired by the public, was meant to enhance the prestige and the dignity of the state.⁵⁷ Then the ambassadors expressed their actual concern, namely the king's gift, and applied for permission to retain the gold chains. As justification, they stressed that they did not wish to adorn themselves with the chains but instead to wear the gifts as a visible sign to the entire world of the monarch's gratitude toward the republic. The chains were interpreted not as reward for the services the ambassadors rendered but as acknowledgment of the marks of respect that the Doge and the senate gave to Henri.⁵⁸ The object was thus abstracted from the body of the wearer and elevated to a medium of symbolic communication; the gift was the visualization of the honor and prestige of Venice. Wearing the chain thus signified service to the state, which the ambassadors demonstrated in humility toward the republic. Moreover, the king had presented the chains in "perpetua memoria."⁵⁹ They are thus situated in the context of an ars memoriae and attest to the two states' outstanding diplomatic relations. These strategies of reasoning were the only way for the ambassadors to reach the goal of retaining the gift. In their report to the senate, they avoided declaring the value of the gold chains, whereas in their correspondence with the Doge, they mentioned an estimated value of 500 ducats for each chain. This sum is confirmed in du Ferrier's account and indicates the king's generosity, for most other dignitaries received gold chains worth only 100 ducats. (In fact, du Ferrier was infuriated when he heard that the king had sent 200 ducats to Colonel Stella because du Ferrier had already awarded him a gold chain worth 100 ducats, unaware of the gift of money. The ambassador stated he would have liked to utilize the ducats for more urgent needs.⁶⁰) The explosive power of this issue, which the senate had to judge with respect to the gifts, is made clear by these documents. On August 28, 1574, judgment was passed. In appreciation of their numerous services in the past and of their high level of personal application during the king's visit, the ambassadors were permitted to retain the gold chains given to them by Henri, but with the proviso that this decision would not set a precedent. The senate explained its judgment as a demonstration of benevolence and munificence toward deserving subjects.⁶¹ The governmental institution thus referred explicitly to the princely virtue of magnanimitas and appropriated the maiestas associated with it. This is one of the monarchic traits that would mold the image of the Venetian republic.

No sources give information about the location of the gold chains that the two secretaries and the young noblemen received. A resolution exists, however, concerning a gift given to the Venetian ambassador to Poland, Girolamo Lippomano, on behalf of Henri on his departure.⁶² According to the account, du Ferrier had withheld a sum of 1,400 ducats, in order to provide the ambassador and his secretary with the traditionally customary gifts, so that they would find them on their return to Venice. For 1,200 ducats, chains or silver tableware were to have been bought for Lippomano and the rest spent on his secretary.⁶³ On January 17, 1575, the senate decided to permit the gift to remain in Lippomano's possession.⁶⁴ A further exception to the rules of law had already been created by the committee on September 20, 1574, when it permitted the Venetian ambassador to the French court, Sigismondo di Cavalli, to retain the gift presented to him by Catherine de' Medici on his departure. In its reasoning, the senate mentioned it wished the generosity that other people had been shown in similar cases should prevail toward Cavalli.⁶⁵

The king commissioned du Ferrier to distribute money, chains, and other gifts on his behalf to numerous people and institutions connected with the visit to Venice.⁶⁶ Gold chains were the most prevalent gifts; their value corresponded to the status of their recipients. Thus, the king had a chain worth 100 ducats presented to the admiral of the Bucintoro. Giovanni Battista Rodengo, the chamberlain, whom Henri had knighted, also received a chain worth 100 ducats. On the recommendation of the duke of Savoy, a chain worth 200 ducats was sent to Andrea Boldù, who had been responsible for the king's personal requirements. Antonio da Canale had assumed responsibility for the festive entry as governatore generale del trionfo. In appreciation of his service, he was knighted by the king and received a gold chain worth 300 ducats. Likewise, Alvise (Luigi) Foscari, in whose palazzo Henri had resided, was thanked with a gold chain worth 300 ducats.⁶⁷ Other people who were knighted during the course of the journey also received gold chains, for example, Bartolomeo Lippomano, the podestà (chief magistrate) of Treviso, Vettor Bragadin, the capitano of Padua, as well as Zuane Foscari, the podestà of Murano. The value of these chains is cited in one Venetian chronicle as 300 ducats per chain. This value cannot be considered reliable, however, because for Giacomo Foscari at least, who is also mentioned in that chronicle, a chain worth 500 ducats is documented.⁶⁸ Antonio Roncalli, in whose palazzo the king spent the night in Rovigo, was knighted and received a gold chain worth 100 ducats.⁶⁹

Gifts of money were just as common. The recipients can be divided into five categories. The first category concerns personnel who either carried out military duties or who were at least engaged in their broader context. The armory, which was visited by the king, received 30 ducats and the Arsenal 800 ducats. Two hundred ducats went to the lieutenant of the bodyguards and his sixty halberds. Twenty drummers received 100 ducats and eighteen trumpeters got 90. Three subordinates of Colonel Stella, who had prepared the quarters for Henri and his entourage, were provided with 30 ducats. The crews of the various boats were also borne in mind: for the galley, which took the king from Murano to the Lido, 100 ducats; for the Bucintoro, in which he made his entry, 100 ducats; for the seventeen gondolas that had stood at the disposal of the king and his entourage, 228 ducats; for the piatta that took him to Padua, 25 ducats.⁷⁰

In addition, there were people who had served the king and his entourage and had performed tasks comparable to offices at court: 60 ducats to the senior seneschal Girolamo as well as a further 60 for the other seneschals; 50 ducats for the master of fare Carlo di Maggi and a total of 23 for his three colleagues; 80 ducats to the six kitchen stewards and their assistants; 60 ducats to ten wine stewards; 130 ducats to thirteen cooks; 42 ducats to seven cellar masters; 48 ducats to twenty-four servants in the Ca' Foscari; and two attendants there together received 25 ducats on special instructions of the king.⁷¹

Furthermore, the Doge's staff, who had participated in ceremonies and in arranging the banquet and the ball at the Sala del Maggior Consiglio, were remembered: the master of ceremonies with 30 ducats, the seneschal with 20 ducats, two valets with 24 ducats, sixteen shield bearers with 80 ducats, the senior door steward of the Collegio with 12 ducats, the keeper of the privy seal of the Doge with 12 ducats, two commanders of the Collegio with 12 ducats, seven pipers with 30 ducats, the players of the silver trumpets with 15 ducats, and the organists and choristers of St. Mark's with 100 ducats in total.⁷²

A fourth group consisted of those people who honored the king in an artistic manner. The majority were orators who dedicated their works to Henri. In du Ferrier's register, the scholars Doni and Andrea Menecchini are highlighted. They presented several panegyrics and poetry and together they received 200 ducats. Two further authors, Francesco Museo and a certain Cordelier received 20 and 10 ducats respectively. The man of letters Carlo Pasquale had a laudatory speech about the king printed, for which he was thanked with 20 ducats. Forty ducats were awarded to Marthe Thudesque and her husband for two musical performances with song. Tintoretto appears to have been rather badly rewarded: he was presented with 50 ducats for the three paintings commissioned by the king. To Pietro Vincentino, who had created thirty-nine gilded sugar figures, went 25 ducats.⁷³

The fifth category comprises donations for religious and charitable purposes. The chaplain who sang Mass during Henri's visit, along with his clerics, received 100 ducats. Five hundred ducats were left for the poor and for pious works. Camille de la Croix, an invalid pensioner of the French crown, who had rendered various services to Henri's entourage, was rewarded with 100 ducats.⁷⁴

An anonymous chronicler, who was the only one to cite correctly all the declarations of value of the gifts and thus must have moved within the circles of the Signoria, emphasized that du Ferrier was commissioned not only with the distribution of the gifts but also with the presentation of a variety of petitions, which had previously been addressed to the king.⁷⁵ The most significant supplicant was Scipio Costanzo. He commanded the bodyguard that escorted the king through Venetian territories. On this occasion, he addressed Henri and asked for intercession so that his son might be freed from Turkish captivity. While still in Venice, the king wrote a letter and entrusted his ambassador to the Sublime Porte with the matter. On Henri's departure, Costanzo was presented with a set of silverware consisting of a bowl and a jug worth 300 ducats.⁷⁶ In his account, du Ferrier recorded only a chain worth 100 ducats.⁷⁷ This is possibly a case like that of Colonel Stella, where du Ferrier did not learn of the king's instructions until after the event.

In the list of accounts from July 31, du Ferrier states the expenditure on gifts as 13,216 ducats. The costs for the gifts for Lippomano and his secretary, amounting to 1,400 ducats, are itemized separately as they were not charged in the immediate context of the state visit but were regarded as farewell gifts at the end of a mission. It may be assumed that the costs were not always recorded immediately, but also written down later from memory. Several people subservient to the king, and assuredly rewarded for that, did not appear in this list, such as the Gelosi theater group who came to Venice on Henri's request; numerous poets, orators, and musicians; the courtesan Veronica Franco who moved in poets' circles and who gave the king two self-composed sonnets and a portrait; the winners of the "war of the fists," or the many officials of lower status.⁷⁸ A total amount of 16,000 ducats, as is stated by Della Croce, is therefore likely.⁷⁹

Following the departure of the monarch, a rumor spread around Venice that the gifts he distributed had turned out to be worth considerably less than expected. The Ferrarese ambassador to the Serenissima, Claudio Ariosto, expressed this opinion in a letter to the duke of Ferrara. He added, however, that he would need more precise information in order to pass judgment. He had heard that the total amount did not exceed 4,000 ducats, in which the diamond ring was already included.⁸⁰ This sum really would have been too low to do justice to a king's prestige. Three days later, however, Ariosto corrected his view. He had in the meantime learned from du Ferrier that at the time in question gifts amounting to only 4,000 ducats had been distributed, but the king had left explicit instructions for a further 10,000 ducats to be spent, and accordingly a grand total of around 14,000 ducats was to be anticipated.⁸¹

Conclusion

The distribution of gifts was an integral component of the rite of passage performed by the king, as pointed up in the report on the festivities by the Bolognese scholar Gregorio Manzini: "adding with these acts to the reputation of a most benevolent and most philanthropic Prince the glory of a most generous and really most noble King."⁸² Only by means of the ritual act of giving was Henri transformed from a benevolent and humane prince into a magnificent king characterized by his generosity. With this step the status of magnificentia principis was reached, which was required by a monarch and which in this case prepared Henri for his future rank. An elected king of Poland was to be elevated to the status of a king of France appointed by God and thus to manifest his function as vicarius Dei. In his capacity as God's representative on earth, the monarch possessed the right to change a person's social status by knighting him. Henri performed this ceremonial act in every place he was welcomed as king. As the knightly accolade was in turn associated with the presentation of a gift, the king continuously set the seal on his function as imago Dei. The journey from Krakow to Paris, which Henri devised as a via triumphalis for his accession to the throne, served to demonstrate and legitimize the prestige of his new monarchic role as rex christianissimus.

The king's sojourn in Venice was staged by the Serenissima as an elaborate multimedia spectacle at which ostensibly the guest of honor was celebrated, but which, when examined in detail, proved to be a strategy of political representation for the glorification and legitimization of the Venetian state. A French monarch entered the city for the first time and thus offered Venice a welcome opportunity for self-presentation. The Serenissima, with the assistance of the Holy League (a coalition of the Papacy, Spain, Venice, the Republic of Genoa, the Duchy of Savoy, and the Knights of Malta), had confirmed its traditional role as a defender of the Christian faith when it defeated the Turks near Lepanto in 1571. This image, however, had been challenged by the European powers since 1573 when the Venetians made a separate peace with the Turks. Venice utilized the visit of the rex christianissimus to cultivate its image systematically, in order to counter rumors of a political nature and to allow the image of the Serenissima as a Christian state blessed by God to bloom anew in public. Thus Henri's visit was regarded as a gift from God, even if it had cost the Venetian exchequer the equivalent of a military campaign.

[fol. 19r] Account of the receipts and expenditures made by myself, Arnoul du Ferrier, advisor to the king on his private council, and his ambassador to Venice, of the funds that the queen mother of the regent king sent to me there for the service of his majesty, and others that I borrowed, on the order of this last on his passage and entry to Venice in the month of July 1574.⁸³

Receipts.

Received from Sirs Strossi, Guadagni, and Carnesequi, bankers, the sum of thirty-five thousand seven hundred fourteen gold écus [ducats], against a letter of currency in the same amount that the queen had me carry, that is	35,714
Received from the said Strossi and Balbani the sum of twelve thousand gold écus that the king ordered me to borrow for his service, that is	12,000
Total sum of the receipts forty-seven thousand seven hundred fourteen gold écus.	47,714

Expenditures made by order of the king and the queen his mother:

First, twelve thousand écus were sent to Vienna on the order of the queen, that is	12,000
Item, given by order of the king to Sir Gentian in Sassil, the sum of seven thousand écus, that is	7,000
Item, to the said Gentian in Venice, seven thousand eight hundred forty-six écus, that is	7,846
For the expenses of those who carried the said twelve thousand écus to Vienna, and several couriers sent by order of the king, and other supplies purchased by me according to the list that had been given, seven hundred and seventeen écus, that is	717
[fol. 19v] Item, by order of the queen, five hundred écus were used by me for certain other supplies, that is	500
Item, for certain musks and other merchandise sold to the king, the sum of one thousand one hundred twenty-five écus was paid to the perfumer of the Lys in Venice, that is	1,125
Item, I retained for myself the sum of one thousand four hundred écus for the gift that must be given to Sir Lippomano, ambassador of these lords to Poland, and to his secretary, who were soon to return and would have found it strange if the said ambassador and secretary did not find there the gift that the king is accustomed to give to ambassadors of princes sent to his majesty, especially given the services performed by the said Sir Lippomano, to whom will be given twelve hundred écus in chains or silver dishes and the rest to his said secretary, that is	1,400

total 30,588

Gifts and presents made by order of his majesty in Venice.

First, a diamond that his majesty gave to the prince of Venice was purchased for the sum of one thousand and fifty écus, that is	1,050
For the Arsenal, eight hundred écus, that is	800
For the crew of the galley on which the king went from Moran to the forts, one hundred écus,	100
For the crew of the Bucintoro on which his majesty made his entry into Venice, and since was taken from his lodgings to the palace, one hundred écus, and to the admiral of the said Bucintoro a chain of one hundred écus, that is	200
[fol. 20r] For the seventeen gondolas destined for the service of his majesty and of his court, two hundred twenty-eight écus, that is	228
For the piatta [a small gilded boat for rivers] on which the king traveled from Lischafusine [Lizzafusina] to Padua, twenty-five écus, that is	25
For the armory, thirty écus, that is	30
To the four ambassadors and two secretaries who accompanied the king from the time he entered the territory of these lords until he departed, a chain of five hundred écus to each of the said ambassadors and another worth two hundred to each of the secretaries, bringing the total to two thousand four hundred écus, that is	2,400
To thirty-nine gentlemen of this state appointed to serve the king, and to accompany him during the time that he was in that city, for each of the said gentlemen, a chain of one hundred écus, that is three thousand nine hundred écus	3,900
(There were forty appointed, but one got sick and it must be asked if it would not be laudable to give him the same gift and then to let me hear about it by this messenger.) ⁸⁴
To Sir Jehanbaptiste Rodingue, maître d'hôtel , who was knighted by the king, a chain of one hundred écus, that is	100
(If the said Rodingue had received a gift on leaving Rovigo, I beg of you to make me aware of it.) ⁸⁵
To Sir Girolamo, senior seneschal sixty écus, that is	60
To Sir Stefano and several other seneschals, sixty écus	60

To Lorens di Rinaldo, Leonard Coroner, and Pietro di Dona, meat steward twenty-three écus, that is to the said Dona eight écus, and the rest to the said Laurens and Leonard, that is	23

To two servants of the said palace by order of his majesty were given twenty-five écus, that is	25
To Sir Foscari, owner of the said palace, a chain of three hundred écus, that is	300
To three men who were employed to prepare the lodgings of the king and his court under Colonel Stella, marshal of the lodgings, thirty écus, that is	30
To the said Colonel Stella a chain of one hundred écus, that is	100
(I hear that the king had two hundred écus given to the said Stella. It would have been good if I had been informed in order to employ this sum in another, more necessary place.) ⁸⁷
To Marthe Thudesque and to her husband who were hired two times to sing and play the lute and the viola, forty écus, that is	40
To Sir André Bolduc, Venetian gentleman, by order of the king at the request of the lord of Savoy, following on Sir de Bellegarde's report, a chain of two hundred écus, that is	200

To the cavalier Canale one worth three hundred.

To Sir Luigi Foscari, owner of the palace where he stayed, one worth three hundred.

To Sir Scipio Costanzo captain of his guard a bowl and jug of silver worth three hundred ducats and besides he offered to set free Sir Giovan Tomaso his only son, who had been made a slave of the Turks.

To the halberds of his guard three hundred ducats.

To the trumpeters ninety.

To the drummers sixty.

To the arsenal thousand.

To the bucintoro two hundred.

To the galley of General Soranzo three hundred.

To the major-domo one hundred.

To the *Credentiero*⁸⁹ fifty.

To three royal gondolas sixty.

To other carmine gondolas twelve for each.

To the musicians three hundred.

To his parish one hundred and to that of his ambassador also one hundred.

For pious works, monasteries, and the poor three hundred and fifty.

The rest was distributed to the family of the Prince and officials of St. Mark, that means to the squires, the cavalier of His Serene Highness, porter of the council, errand boys, keeper of the privy seal of the Doge, servants of the heads [of the council of 40], some twenty some thirty and some forty depending on the office and the person's rank, and similarly to the officials who served at the Foscari palace, including also the writers and poets who presented to the above-mentioned Majesty works in Latin and poems made for his praise, magnificence, and splendor, and these who presented paintings and other similar things, the actors who entertained him several times, and beside the gifts made to secretaries and officials who were charged with serving him during his travel from entering this state, which amount to the sum of about sixteen thousand ducats.

When the Duke of Savoy was leaving, he gave a very beautiful present to the wife of the most reverend Luigi Mocenigo, owner of the house where he stayed: a jewel belt made of thirty golden rosettes and each of them has four pearls and a jewel in the middle worth about one thousand eight hundred ducats.

Re di Francia, et Polonia, con la descrizione particolare della pompa, e del numero, et varietà delli Bregantini, Palaschermi, et altri vaselli armati, con la declaratione dell'edificio, et arco fatto al Lido* (Venice, 1574), 12f.

7. Venice is divided into six districts. The inhabitants of the districts Castello, San Marco, and Dorsoduro are called Castellani and those of San Polo, Santa Croce, and Cannaregio are called Nicoletti.

8. For the details of the course of events during the state visit, see Della Croce, L'istoria della publica et famosa entrata in Vinegia; ASV, Collegio, Cerimoniali I, fols. 43r-45r; Rocco Benedetti, *Le feste, et trionfi fatti dalla Sereniss. 10. One ducat was worth 124 soldi. In 1574, in the building trades the average daily rates payable to masters were 35 soldi and to laborers 24 soldi. Thus a master had to work three and a half days and a laborer five days to earn one ducat. See Brian Pullan, "Wage-Earners and the Venetian Economy, 1550-1630," in Crisis and Change in the Venetian Economy in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, ed. Brian Pullan (London, 1968), 158.
