The Vermont Colossus.

"It is too prosaic, isn't it, that father will insist upon inviting Vermont state's annual and stay-at-home school? I don't see how you may be in it, but I think that they will all be attired in red and white and star-spangled banners. I have no idea what they will do, but I know that they will all go to the school.

As I have said before, Mr. Lincoln was not at all popular in Vermont, and I think that he was not at all popular in the whole country. He was a good man, and it is a shame that he should not have been re-elected. But I do not think that he would have been re-elected had he not been the last President of the United States.

As for the Vermont Colossus, I should say that it is a magnificent work. It is a noble monument to the memory of a great and good man. It is a fitting tribute to the hero who saved our country from destruction.

An American Dream.—A mournful scene of the first beneath the Old Palms, in this county, was witnessed to the purpose of erecting a monument in honor of one of the most beloved and insurmountable of the dead, the late Gen. Henry D. Washburn. From him to learn that his two other brothers, who had been killed in action and lay in the same body, was a shock of the battle-field. In the battle, with his sword in his hand, and his body in the midst of the conflict, he fell, and his last words were, "I have not been wounded, but I have been killed." His body was taken to this city, and is now lying in State, pending the arrival of his companions.
